Leslie Scarman was one of the most influential minds in the common law of the twentieth century. He was a distinguished judge; but that was not what made him special. His singular contributions lay in the part he played in introducing institutional law reform as a regular fact of our legal life and his early endorsement of legally protected human rights in a culture traditionally hostile to that idea. As I shall show, there was a unity in his legal philosophy. It continues to have an impact. His beneficiaries are legion, not only in Britain but everywhere the common law is practised.

I first met Scarman in 1975. I had just been appointed foundation Chairman of the Australian Law Reform Commission. He had then recently retired as the first Chairman of the Law Commission of England and Wales. He was graceful and energetic in our encounters. He had a stooping figure, with a face that few who looked on it could forget: pale, high cheek bones, dimples occasionally showing in the sunken cheeks whenever his taut skin would permit it\(^1\). He was genuinely interested in the plans for law reform that we were formulating on the opposite side of the world. His enthusiasm was infectious.

Nearly a decade later, in 1983-4, we had two further encounters. He wrote a foreword to a book of essays of mine\(^2\). It mixed in equal portions his support for youthful Australian commitment to the "all-embracing, universal approach" to law reform whilst adding due warnings about the "doubting voices to be heard in the dark jungle of the law". He noted Sir Michael Kerr's unanswered question about securing parliamentary time to consider proposals for law reform. But he commended a bold approach "to all with a social conscience"\(^3\). And he asked, "Who has no such conscience?". For Scarman, life without social engagement was unthinkable. Yet he saw, from great experience, the need to work within the legal system to give social conscience a reality and to improve the law's capacity to deliver justice.

---

\(^1\) Sybille Bedford's description in As It Was (Picador, 1990) depicting Scarman as a judge in In the Estate of Fuld Deceased [1965] P 405, a probate suit that lasted 91 days.

\(^3\) Ibid, vii.
By this time, Scarman had become Baron Scarman of Quatt, a Shropshire village near the Welsh border. We met again in New Zealand in 1984 where he was the principal judicial guest at the national law conference, held in Rotorua⁴.

The conference fell during the week of Anzac Day. This is a holiday that Australia and New Zealand share to commemorate the landing of their joint army corps at Gallipoli, in Turkey, in a bold but ultimately fruitless endeavour of the British Empire to open a second front in the Great War. Scarman was everywhere during that conference. He shared fully in our egalitarian antipodean ways. He was utterly without airs and graces. He joined the Australasian participants at the Dawn Service. Beckoned to the shore of Lake Rotorua by Maori soldiers, past and present, we gathered at Ohinemutu in the swirling mists, emanating from subterranean effusions. Because of his height, Scarman stood out – tall and spare. He joined us in reverence to the moment that our three nations shared. Maori and Pakeha New Zealanders, Australians and British were brought together in the special harmony of history, lost blood, wars, our liberties and the enduring legal system that we share in common.

Scarman was a natural leader. Most of us in Rotorua deferred to him for his fame and achievements which were already considerable. I secured a photograph showing us together during that conference. Alongside an image that Lord Denning had signed for me two decades earlier at the Sydney Law School, that image has accompanied me in my chambers throughout my career. Denning and Scarman, two distinct, creative leaders of our law. They were figures larger than life. They had an influence that spread throughout the Commonwealth of Nations and beyond.

There were important differences in the approaches to law of Denning and Scarman. As a judge, Scarman was much more traditional and less creative. He saw the way to overcome obstacles to justice in the law "not by departure from precedent but by amending legislation". He was fearful of too much judicial invention in the courtroom. He thought that this could lead to "confidence in the judicial system [being] replaced by fear of it becoming uncertain and arbitrary in its application". He was anxious lest this would render "society … ready for Parliament to cut the power of the judges. Their power to do justice will become more restricted by law than it need be, or is today".

---

6 See eg the foreword by Dr L M Singvi to the lecture Law Reform in a Democratic Society (1985), New Delhi, India, writing of Lord Scarman’s reputation in India.

7 Pirelli General Cable Works Ltd v Oscar Faber and Partners [1983] 2 AC 1 at 19.

Scarman's appointment to the House of Lords, where judicial choices must legitimately, and often, be made to re-express the old law and to make it suitable for new times, made little difference. As a judge he remained conventional. He offered barely disguised criticism of Lord Denning's creativity which he clearly found distasteful and even, on occasion, dishonest\(^9\). He kept his personal liberalism in firm check or channelled it carefully as, for example, in his decision on the law of blasphemy in the Gay News case\(^{10}\). In Sidaway v Governors of Bethlem Royal Hospital\(^{11}\), he declined to fashion a new principle of informed consent for medical treatment, although final courts in Australia\(^{12}\), Canada\(^{13}\) and elsewhere were to experience no such hesitations.

For this restraint Scarman was sometimes criticised as an unreliable 'liberal', who failed to use his proper authority as a judge -

---

\(^{10}\) Reg v Lemon (Whitehouse v Gay News Ltd) [1979] AC 617 at 658.

\(^{12}\) Rogers v Whitaker (1992) 175 CLR 479.

\(^{13}\) Reibl v Hughes [1980] 2 SCR 880 at 894-895; (1980) 114 DLR (3d) at 13. In Rogers, the High Court of Australia declined to apply Bollam v Friern Hospital Management Committee [1957] 1 WRL 582; [1957] 2 All ER 118 or to follow Sidaway [1985] AC 871.
especially in the final court - to push the law in the directions that modernity and justice could readily sustain\textsuperscript{14}. Yet in a sense, it was Scarman's very disinclination to exhibit creativity from the judicial seat that propelled him towards the two great instruments of reform with which his name will always be attached. I refer to his work as the first Chairman of the English Law Commission and his pioneering advocacy, from as early as 1974\textsuperscript{15}, of acceptance of the European idea of a charter of fundamental human rights. It was by parliamentary law reform, and by judicial creativity specifically authorised by parliamentary law, that Scarman thought English law should develop; and basically not otherwise.

The Law Commission that Scarman helped to establish still flourishes. It became the model for like institutions throughout the Commonwealth of Nations. It still is. Yet his dearest wish was to live to see the Human Rights Act 1998 (UK) come into force. This wish was granted to him. By endorsing and ensuring the success of these new institutions and procedures, Scarman put his imprint on the present and the future face of English law. It was a mighty contribution. My purpose is to chronicle and celebrate it.

\textsuperscript{14} Lee, 154 at 155.
Because this is the first lecture to honour Leslie Scarman, I will say something of the parts into which his life may be divided. I will acknowledge his service as a judge by indicating some of the many instances in which his reasoning has been accepted and applied in Australia. I will describe his contribution to establishing the modern institutions of law reform that have spread throughout the world. I will recount the ongoing challenges for institutional law reform that he foresaw twenty years ago in his foreword to my book. Finally, I will demonstrate the great importance for good governance of the bold appeal that Scarman made for enshrining fundamental human rights and freedoms in the law. I will demonstrate the importance of his appeal. It was fulfilled just in time.

EARLY LIFE AND WAR YEARS

Leslie Scarman was born on 29 July 1911 in Streatham. As chance would have it, this was only a few miles from Brixton, a London suburb that would later play an important part in his life. He said that his grandfather was "a complete Cockney" who married a French Protestant\(^\text{16}\). Their son, Scarman's father, became a Lloyds' underwriter. He described his mother as a "fierce and lovely" Scot\(^\text{17}\). He was educated at Radley College, thanks partly to scholarships that he won by his precocious talent. At Brasenose College, Oxford, he achieved a double First. In 1936 he joined Middle Temple as a Harmsworth law scholar.

\(^{16}\) Many details of his early life draw on Scarman's conversation with John Mortimer, published in the latter's Character Parts (Penguin, 1987), 198.

The advent of the Second World War saw Scarman enlist in the Royal Air Force. After a time at a desk in Abigdon, he was appointed to Bomber Command in North Africa where the later Air Chief Marshall Tedder enlisted him to out-manoeuvre an endeavour to have Tedder serve in Courts Martial. The young lawyer outwitted the Air Ministry which it eventually dropped the idea. Tedder was saved for more urgent work. Tedder kept Scarman in his entourage. He was there with Tedder and Eisenhower when General Jodl surrendered the Germany Army at Rheims\(^{18}\).

Returning to the Bar in London as a Wing Commander with an OBE, the young Scarman began to build a successful practice with an eclectic group of clients who ranged from communists to Sir Oswald Mosley of Blackshirts fame\(^{19}\). He was inspired by the stories of the great advocates of the past. However, realising that he lacked the theatrical flourishes of his heroes, he turned his attention to the purer delights of law. It was to be a happy choice which lasted the rest of his life.

---

\(^{19}\) Ibid. He was reportedly a consummate advocate in dismembering expert witnesses: Lord Bingham of Cornhill, Obituary, Memorial Service, December 2004, 1.
Equally happy and enduring was his marriage in 1947 to Ruth Clement Wright. She, and their son, John, were to share Scarman's remarkable career and to survive him to witness the national and international honour accorded to him.

Scarman took silk in 1957. As an advocate he declined to embrace well meaning, but mistaken, judicial suggestions that he regarded as wrong in law. He demonstrated, as he later would as a judge, a fidelity to the law that sometimes made him appear conservative and uncreative. In 1961 he was appointed to the High Court. His background at this stage was one normally associated "with traditional judges - public school, Oxford, a First in Greats, a long and happy marriage, and informed enthusiasm for the arts, especially opera ..."

LAW REFORM

All of this goes to show the dangers of stereotyping. It was Lord Chancellor Gerald Gardiner, in the Wilson Labour Government that took office in 1964, who saw in Scarman the perfect lawyer to launch his bold new idea: the Law Commission. Law reform was a major objective of

---

21 Lee, 160.
Gardiner and of the government. Scarman was the man to put institutional law reform on the map as a parliamentary strategy for improving the whole body of the law. What was needed was a permanent institution, not merely a reactive activity when fires were already burning\textsuperscript{22}. The task before the new Commission was daunting\textsuperscript{23}:

"English law today is contained in some 3,000 Acts of Parliament, the earliest of which dates from the year 1235, in many volumes of delegated legislation made under the authority of those Acts, and in over 300,000 reported cases. ... The result is that it is today extremely difficult for anyone without special training to discover what the law is on any given topic; and when the law is finally ascertained, it is found in many cases to be obsolete and in some cases to be unjust".

For Scarman, these features of English law were "plainly wrong". The Law Commissions were established to keep "the law as a whole under review and [to make] recommendations for its systematic reform". In the place of individual decisions by separate government departments and agencies, a new body would submit a programme and pull together the efforts to assist Parliament to modernise, simplify, consolidate and, where appropriate, codify the law.

\textsuperscript{22} Sedley, Obituary.

\textsuperscript{23} Proposals for English and Scottish Law Commissions (January, 1965), 2.
In the Law Commission's first programme on consolidation and statute law revision\textsuperscript{24} Scarman and his distinguished first team of Commissioners, Professor L C B Gower, Mr Neil Lawson QC, Norman Marsh and Andrew Martin QC, expressed optimism that the new approach of the Commission to statute law revision "will not only reduce appreciably the number of Acts remaining to be consolidated, but also facilitate consolidation by getting rid of these unnecessary provisions which tend, as things now are, to make consolidation difficult"\textsuperscript{25}.

If this vision of root and branch cleansing of the statute book was unduly optimistic, doomed to defeat by the ever-increasing number and size of laws made by or under Parliament\textsuperscript{26}, the aim was certainly a noble and worthy one. And at the helm was a lawyer displaying rare gifts. Many would later comment on his great instincts as a "listener-judge"\textsuperscript{27}. He was strongly in favour of consultation. This attitude of bottom-up government in the place of top-down rule had its source in Scarman's fundamental respect for the dignity, rights and insights that human beings can offer to lawyers charged with shaping the law. He listened not just because it was courteous but because it was often productive.

\textsuperscript{24} Law Com No 2 (1965).
\textsuperscript{25} Ibid, 6.
\textsuperscript{27} See eg Lee, 189.
According to Elizabeth Evatt, then a young Australia researcher in Scarman's team, Scarman's listening capacity was a key to his success in the Law Commission\textsuperscript{28}. It allowed him to absorb the strongly expressed and sometimes conflicting views of his colleagues and to derive from them a conclusion that all would accept. He won the day with humour, grace and charm. They were qualities that Elizabeth Evatt was herself to bring to many high offices in Australia and beyond – including as President of the Australian Law Reform Commission.

It was under Scarman that the Law Commission initiated procedures that involved professional and expert consultation by the use of working papers\textsuperscript{29}. There were broader strategies too, designed to tackle the narrow and sometimes antagonistic judicial interpretation of legislation that not infrequently frustrated the implementation of Parliament's purpose, driving the legislators into more and more detailed prescription\textsuperscript{30}. In his new post in the Law Commission, Scarman must

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{28} Letter to the author from the Hon Elizabeth Evatt, 31 December 2005. She says: "He was universally admired and respected by all the staff who found him inspiring when he delved into their topics."
\end{itemize}
sometimes have felt like Air Marshall Tedder. Gifts of micro-management were essential, for there were a thousand tasks, legal, consultative and administrative to be performed. But the macro-function of viewing the entire battlefield could never be forgotten. This required special talents of perception, imagination, persuasion and leadership. In Scarman, the Law Commission of England and Wales was greatly fortunate. As well as being a good listener, he was sharp in analysis, brimming over with ideas, sweet in disposition, egalitarian in relationships, persuasive in advocacy and resolute in action. He became the example and beacon for institutional law reformers everywhere.

PUBLIC INQUIRIES

In 1969, Scarman conducted the first of four major enquiries by which he earned public recognition and cross-party political respect. This was an inquiry into troubles that had occurred in Belfast and Londonderry. The inquiry took two years. It necessitated all his skills of discussion and negotiation which he had refined in the Law Commission. It took him far from courtrooms into schools and community halls. His report was widely praised\(^{31}\). It led to the arrival of British troops to keep order in the Province.

\(^{31}\) Report on Northern Ireland (1972), Cmnd 566.
A second inquiry took place in 1974. It concerned a riot in Red Lion Square in London after rival left-wing and right-wing demonstrators had clashed over immigration rules. The clash led to the death of a participant. Scarman’s report blamed an international Marxist group for starting the dispute by deliberately attacking the police. His practised hand, careful listening and quick and skilful analysis with recommendations for action again commanded public and governmental appreciation. In 1977 he conducted a third inquiry into the Grunwick trade union dispute. But it was his fourth and last major inquiry, in 1981, into riots that had broken out in Brixton, near where he had been born, that captured the greatest attention and earned him most acclaim.

For two days and nights in April 1981 riots had raged in Brixton. Three hundred people were injured and twenty-eight buildings were set ablaze. The violence spread to Bristol, Leeds and Merseyside. Circumstances of racial tension and police ineptitude demanded an inquiry chairman who was at once firm and approachable, trusted and insightful. For the British Government, under Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, Scarman might have seemed a little risky because of his personal reputation for liberalism. Yet once again he showed consummate ability and skills that were original and virtually unique. He tackled the causes and not just the symptoms of the problem.

The achievement of the Brixton report was the outreach of Scarman to groups and individuals angry and unrepentant in the raw public mood that followed the unrest. In performing his inquiry, Scarman showed forbearance in responding to the anger of some of those who came to participate in the proceedings. When one Rastafarian shouted and swore at him in a public session, Scarman insisted that he should have his say. Twenty minutes later, when the contrite protester asked permission to return to the hearing that he had quit, Scarman readily gave his agreement. Some lawyers and judges at the time questioned Scarman's appearances on television. Yet looking back, most would say now with Lord Bingham of Cornhill: "I can see … that he was utterly right".

By his procedures and his report, Scarman helped to defuse a very dangerous situation. His recommendations included the appointment of more police from minority communities; the establishment of police-community liaison groups; the adoption of policies to reduce ethnic unemployment; and the introduction of new police rules to make racial discrimination a disciplinary offence. By these proposals, Scarman took a first, vital step to improving policing from within\textsuperscript{36}. If, looking back, he seemed over-ready to ascribe defects to "bad apples" rather than to a deeper institutional malaise, his reforms were radical for the time. Moreover, they were pitched at the level likely to secure implementation by the then government\textsuperscript{37}.

---

34 The Economist, 1 January 2005, p 68 (Obituary of Lord Scarman).

The Brixton report represented a powerful performance. It was watched within and outside Britain\textsuperscript{38}. It stamped Scarman's personality and his grace and thoughtfulness\textsuperscript{39} on the consciousness of the British public to a degree that few judges have attained before or since. Apart from everything else, it helped to show a new face of the British judiciary to ordinary citizens. Not simply remote establishment figures learned in the law; but human beings concerned about feelings of injustice and marginalisation and determined to do what they could to ferret out wrongs and to set them right.

There are, of course, critics of the involvement of serving judges in the conduct of inquiries that have political overtones where those judges

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{36} Ibid.
\item \textsuperscript{37} The Economist, above n 34, 68.
\item \textsuperscript{38} Ibid. There were analogous legal inquiries in Australia. See, eg, Australian Law Reform Commission, Complaints Against Police (ALRC 1, 1975) and ibid, Complaints Against Police (Supplementary Report) (ALRC 9, 1978).
\item \textsuperscript{39} Sedley, Obituary.
\end{itemize}
are likely to come under attack and suspicion\textsuperscript{40}. In Australia, serving federal judges cannot be compelled to perform such functions for the Executive and they are now severely limited in the functions they may agree to perform\textsuperscript{41}. However, extraordinary events sometimes call forth extraordinary responses. In his inquiries, Scarman showed a sure hand.

THE JUDGE

Following his service in the Law Commission, and in the public inquiries that made him famous, Scarman was appointed successively as a Lord Justice of Appeal (1973) and as a Lord of Appeal in Ordinary (1977).

In the High Court, he had observed defects in the divorce law that encouraged his later work in the Law Commission towards the eventual enactment of the Divorce Reform Act 1969 (UK). In many cases, in the Court of Appeal, even in the remarkable era in which Lord Denning presided, Scarman made his mark as a gifted judge. He wrote lucid and powerful prose. The same skills of verbal communication that strengthened the documents of the Law Commission and made the reports of his inquiries compelling reading, were deployed with great effect. This is one reason why we, the judges who follow, in Britain and the Commonwealth, often reach for Scarman in the Court of Appeal to guide our reasoning.

\textsuperscript{40} Lord Morris of Aberavon QC discussing the Scarman inquiries (648 HL Debates 883 (31 May 2003)) noted J Beatson, "Should Judges Conduct Public Inquiries?" (2005) 121 Law Quarterly Review 221 at 252.

\textsuperscript{41} Wilson v Minister for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Affairs (1996) 189 CLR 1.

Scarman's command of administrative law may be seen in the Barnsley Council case. His awareness of the deep principles of the criminal law and the rules of court procedure have proved influential. His expositions of the law of evidence have been seen as useful. Unsurprisingly, his opinions on statutory interpretation, a subject of close concern to the Law Commission, have proved persuasive to later generations of judges, searching for a purposive or functional approach to that task in the place of the strict literalism of earlier times.

42. Reg v Barnsley Council; Ex parte Hook [1976] 1 WLR 1052 at 1058; See Heatley v Tasmanian Racing and Gaming Commission (1977) 137 CLR 487 at 509.

43. R v Preece [1977] QB 370 at 375-376. This was applied in Crampton v The Queen (2000) 206 CLR 161 at 186-187 [61]-[62] and 194-195 [91], [95].

44. Goldsmith v Sperrings Ltd [1977] 1 WLR 478 at 498-499. This was applied in Williams v Spautz (1992) 174 CLR 509 at 522, 529, 553.

In a comparatively recent case in my own Court, *Coleman v Power*47, a question arose as to whether legislation should be construed as its language would have been understood by the parliamentarians who enacted it or as a law speaking to contemporary citizens who were bound by its terms. One party invoked the former approach, encapsulated in the maxim: contemporanea expositio est optima et fortissima in lege. That approach had some support in Australian authority48. My own view was that the statute in question, one concerned with insulting behaviour and public order, was to be read in accordance with its ordinary and current meaning of the present age, given its object and the significant changes that had occurred in community values affecting such matters.

In *Ahmad v Inner London Education Authority*49, Scarman LJ added a further reason for adopting such an interpretation "derived from the living language of the law as read today"50. He was there construing a provision of the Education Act 1944 (UK). He made it clear that that task was to be accomplished "not against the background of the law and society of 1944 but in a … society which has accepted international obligations”[51]. This was the approach that I followed in Coleman v Power as, effectively, did a majority of the High Court of Australia in that case.

48 See Corporate Affairs Commission (NSW) v Yuill (1991) 172 CLR 319 at 322-323.
50 Coleman (2004) 220 CLR 1 at 95 [245].

As I know from my own experience in an intermediate court, which was longer than Scarman’s there, the most creative aspirations in all save perhaps a judge like Denning, are tamed by the ever-present prospect of a further appeal to a final court. The judicial eagle may want to soar; but reality and duty keep it tethered. When, in 1978, Scarman was elevated to the House of Lords, he joined a most formidable Bench: Wilberforce, Diplock, Salmon, Edmund-Davies, Russell of Killowen, Fraser and Keith. It was then that Scarman, the judge, was greatly tested. Yet in the company of giants, he made a mark. I would single out amongst his most influential speeches one in the field of administrative law, the Civil Servants’ Union case[52], and one on constitutional law concerning broadcasters’ contempt, in Attorney-General v British Broadcasting Corporation[53]. That decision and the later one in Home Office v Harman[54] have influenced the development

---

[51] [1978] QB 36 at 48.
[52] Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister for the Civil Service [1985] AC 374. Lord Scarman affirmed, at 407, that “the controlling factor in determining whether the exercise of prerogative power is subject to judicial review is not its source but its subject matter”. This was applied in DPP (SA) v B (1998) 194 CLR 566 at 599 [62].
[53] [1981] AC 303 at 360. This was applied in Re Tracey; Ex parte Ryan (1989) 166 CLR 518 at 539 per Mason CJ, Wilson and Dawson JJ and at 572 per Brennan and Toohey JJ.
[54] [1983] 1 AC 280. of the law of contempt in a world that is now more accepting of public discussion and criticism of authority\textsuperscript{55}.

Scarman was by this stage a judge of great experience and skill, writing with assurance on a whole range of legal concerns. Thus, his exposition of contract law in \textit{Woodar Investments Pty Ltd v Wimpey Ltd}\textsuperscript{56} has proved influential in Australia\textsuperscript{57}. His criticism of the law of privity of contract and his suggestion that the House of Lords might reconsider the cases "which stand guard over this unjust rule"\textsuperscript{58} was to encourage the High Court of Australia to re-express the law on that topic. Many of his statements on the law of damages have proved influential in Australia. His elaboration of the law of equity in the context of the specially protected status for married women\textsuperscript{59} in \textit{National Westminster Bank Plc v Morgan}\textsuperscript{60}, although quite traditional, \textsuperscript{55} See eg \textit{Hinch v Attorney-General (Vic)} (1987) 164 CLR 15.

\textsuperscript{56} [1980] 1 WLR 277.
\textsuperscript{57} \textit{Trident General Insurance Co Ltd v McNiece Bros Pty Ltd} (1988) 165 CLR 107 at 117, 165.
\textsuperscript{58} \textit{Woodar} [1980] 1 WLR 277 at 300.
\textsuperscript{60} [1985] AC 686 at 708.
encouraged me to seek a new and broader foundation for the protection that would address, amongst other things, an expanding class of vulnerable relationships rather than the category of married woman as such – including people in de facto married relationships and same-sex couples.

Scarman's statements on the law affecting infants and children, most especially in Gillick's case in relation to the lawfulness of a doctor's prescribing contraceptives for a girl under the age of sixteen years without the consent or knowledge of her parents, also proved highly influential in Australia. The beauty and power of Scarman's exposition can be appreciated in the following extract:

"The House's task, therefore, as the supreme court in a legal system largely based on rules of law evolved over the years by the judicial process, is to search the over-full and cluttered shelves of the law reports for a principle, or set of principles, recognised by the judges over the years but stripped of the detail which, however appropriate to their day, would, if applied today, lay the judges open to a justified criticism for failing to keep the law abreast of the society in which they live and work ... If the law should impose upon the process of "growing up" fixed limits where nature knows only a continuous process, the price would be artificiality and a lack of realism in an area where the law must be sensitive to human development and social change”.

---

63 Gillick [1986] 1 AC 112 at 184.

65 Gillick [1986] 1 AC 112 at 183.

Scarman was conscious of the changing values that must find reflection in the law. But he was quite cautious and principled - an approach reinforced by his years in the Law Commission and in conducting sensitive public inquiries. An illustration of this approach to law can be seen in an important technique that Scarman accepted for preserving the principle of open court hearings whilst protecting, in some circumstances, legitimate expectations of confidentiality. To avoid the conceptual and practical problems of a court's making a non-publication order concerning the identity of a person or thing, Scarman endorsed the so-called "Leveller expedient", named after the case in which it was described66. In many instances, competing values can be reconciled by the simple expedient of obviating the use of the name or identity to be protected and substituting a pseudonym, or initials, or by writing that name on a document that is within the control of the judge and not publicly disclosed without an order permitting that course. This eminently sensible procedure is commonly followed in Australia to protect the identity of police informers and others\textsuperscript{67}. It was endorsed by Scarman in the \textit{Leveller} litigation. Of course, there are cases where disclosure will be required in the public interest\textsuperscript{68} or to assist a party in the presentation of its case, as for example to demonstrate that party's innocence of an offence\textsuperscript{69}. But for most cases, the \textit{Leveller} expedient is practical and works well.

---

Scarman's decision in the \textit{Sidaway} case\textsuperscript{70} held back from embracing a robust new principle of informed consent for the performance of medical procedures. Yet it nudged English law a little way in that direction, anticipating further steps taken in later decisions that Scarman, the judge, did not feel that he should take\textsuperscript{71}. In Australia and elsewhere, his reasons in \textit{Sidaway} were considered carefully in the elaboration of the stronger principle that was endorsed in \textit{Rogers v Whitaker}\textsuperscript{72}. That principle has been applied ever since\textsuperscript{73}.

\begin{footnotesize}
\item[67] See eg \textit{Attorney-General for NSW v Mayas Pty Ltd} (1988) 14 NSWLR 342.
\item[68] See eg \textit{In a Matter of an Application by Chief Commissioner of Victoria Police} (2005) 79 ALJR 881 at 895 [83].
\item[70] \textit{Sidaway} [1985] AC 871 at 882. See comment in \textit{Rogers v Whitaker} (1992) 175 CLR 479 at 489.
\item[71] See eg \textit{Bolita v City and Hackney Health Authority} [1998] AC 232; \textit{Pearce v United Bristol Healthcare NHS Trust} [1999] PIQR P53 at 59; \textit{Chester v Afshar} [2005] 1 AC 115 at 42 [9], 143 [15], 163 [88], 166 [99].
\item[72] (1992) 175 CLR 479 at 483-484.
\end{footnotesize}
Scarman's approach to matters of practice and procedure in the law can be seen in many decisions. In Maynard v West Midlands Regional Health Authority\(^{74}\), he wisely cautioned appellate courts over the disadvantages they face when reconsidering a trial on the transcript record. Conventionally, those disadvantages had been explained by reference to the trial judge's unique ability to assess the credibility of witnesses from their appearance in court. As this notion has suffered a battering because of scientific research about the unreliability of telling truth from falsehood on the basis of appearances, Scarman's alternative rationale for caution has taken on a greater importance. This is the difficulty of recapturing the "feeling" of a case from selected passages of transcript typically quoted on appeal when compared with the trial judge's position, absorbing all of the evidence and considering it as it unfolds in sequence\(^{75}\).

There are many other cases in which Scarman's reasons in the House of Lords have proved significant, including in Australia, as an exposition of the law. In administrative law there is the decision in the Federation of Self-Employed\(^{76}\). In constitutional law there is the Dupont Steels case\(^{77}\). In criminal procedures, involving the provision of a permanent stay of proceedings that are greatly delayed or otherwise unfair, Scarman's reminder\(^{78}\) that the community expects trials to be fair proved timely and influential in Australia\(^{79}\). So did his warnings about the limited role of judicial interference in prosecutorial decisions\(^{80}\).

---

\(^{74}\) [1984] 1 WLR 634 at 637.

Although glimmerings of creativity were to be found in Scarman's judicial work, for the most part he was very cautious, even in the Lords. Generally speaking, he did not accept suggestions that the law should be restated by the courts in significantly different ways. Perhaps the clearest instance of this can be seen was in his response to the case of Gay News, prosecuted for blasphemous libel for suggesting that Jesus Christ, in His lifetime, was a homosexual who engaged in promiscuous sex with the Apostles and other men.

\(^{76}\) Reg v IRC; Ex parte National Federation of Self Employed [1982] AC 617 at 650; see Commissioner of State Revenue (Vic) v Royal Insurance Australia Ltd (1994) 182 CLR 51 at 81.

\(^{79}\) eg Jago v District Court (NSW) (1989) 168 CLR 23 at 29, 33, 52.

A private prosecution was brought against the publishers and the jury were charged that it was not necessary for the Crown to establish any intention on the part of the publishers, beyond that to publish the document found to be a blasphemous libel. According to this instruction, no specific intent to blaspheme was required. The House of Lords\(^81\) was evenly divided. Lord Diplock and Lord Edmund-Davies held that proof of specific intent to blaspheme was obligatory. Viscount Dilhorne and Lord Russell of Killowen were of the contrary view. History seemed to be on the side of the latter. However, the developing principles of the criminal law and modern notions of free and diverse expression appeared to favour the former view.

Scarman cast the decisive vote. He sided with history and the traditional expression of the law of blasphemy. Yet he offered a special and personal justification for his opinion, seeking to reconcile it with his conception of "a plural society which recognises the human rights and fundamental freedoms of the European Convention"\(^82\). This was the need to balance freedom of expression with "duties and responsibilities" that were formulated "for the protection of the reputation or rights of others". The conviction of Gay News and its editor was thus confirmed.

\(^{81}\) Reg v Lemon [1979] AC 617. For later cases see Gay News Ltd v United Kingdom (1982) 5 EHRR 123 and Reg v Bow Street Stipendiary Magistrate; Ex parte Chowdhury [1990] 3 All ER 986.

\(^{82}\) [1979] AC 617 at 665.
Scarman expressly stated that it was not open to the Law Lords, acting judicially, "to extend the law beyond the limits recognised by the House\textsuperscript{83} ... or to make, by judicial decision, the comprehensive reform of the law which I believe to be beneficial".

Of course, this decision has to be judged in the context of judicial and social attitudes of 1979, not those of a plural Western democracy twenty-five years later. As I well know, attitudes to homosexuality in the 1970s were still generally primitive and punitive in Australia as much as Britain. Scarman acknowledged that the accused "would have said, and truly said, that he had no intention to shock Christian believers but that he published the poem ... to comfort practising homosexuals by encouraging them to feel that there was room for them in the Christian religion". He assumed the honesty and sincerity of the publisher's motives. However, he adhered to the old expression of the offence of blasphemy dating back to the seventeenth century.

For Scarman, it was for Parliament, if anyone, to change the ingredients of the offence. It was not for the courts - even the nation's final and supreme court. He hinted that the law should indeed be changed in order to address, in the modern context, the original purpose of blasphemous libel, namely "to safeguard the internal tranquillity of the kingdom"\textsuperscript{84}. He argued strongly that the offence should be altered by legislation to protect the religious feelings of all, including non-Christians now living in a pluralist society. He made it clear that "my criticism of the common law offence of blasphemy is not that it exists but that it is not sufficiently comprehensive. It is shackled by the chains of history".

\textsuperscript{83} Bowman v Secular Society Ltd [1917] AC 406.
\textsuperscript{84} [1979] AC 617 at 658.

The responses to Scarman's shackled approach at the time were mixed. Some regarded this, and other decisions in which he participated judicially, as demonstrating, in a judge of proved sensitivity and insight sitting in the final court, a deep conservatism which no amount of liberal talk could justify. For people of this view, cases like Gay News amounted to a betrayal by Scarman of the responsibility and choices inherent in a final court. Others saw Scarman's position as principled, avoiding "judicial activism" and limiting the ambit of invention from the judgment seat. Indeed, it was this demonstrated sense of restraint that made Scarman, the judge, specially attractive to supporters of Ronald Dworkin's views, expressed in his book, Law's Empire, about limited judicial involvement with policy.

Professor Simon Lee classified Scarman as a "great judge" of his time precisely because he put his skills to good use - as much in his inquiries as in his judicial decisions - exhibiting "a shrewd appreciation of the role of law in society - of the policy factors". But there is no doubt that Scarman had a much more restrained notion of judicial creativity than was to develop after his judicial service. Ironically, this development was itself almost certainly a consequence of the creative impetus of law reform and human rights that Scarman helped to release in the law. Creativity there would be. But for Scarman it would flow only from sources that he regarded as legitimate.

---

86 R Dworkin, Law's Empire, 244, 1986.

Most of us exhibit inconsistencies in our makeup. On particular issues and in particular cases, we may show alternatively inclinations to stability and change; unyielding application of the old law and elsewhere creative choices to overcome clear injustices. In this, Scarman was no different from the rest. At various times, his rhetoric, powerful as it was, reflected both moods. Yet, more than for most, there was a fundamental unity in Scarman's judicial approach. Generally, he thought it enough for a judge, even in the House of Lords, to find and apply the old law. If change was needed, Scarman's view was, normally, that this was a role for Parliament, assisted by a body such as the Law Commission. To enlarge the judicial role something new was needed. The adoption of fresh approaches to statutory interpretation and the incorporation of fundamental human rights in English domestic law were, for Scarman, the prerequisites to greater curial innovation.

88 In re James (An Insolvent) [1977] Ch D 41 at 71. This was applied in Attorney-General for the Commonwealth v Tse Chu Fai (1998) 193 CLR 128 at 149 [55]. See also Air India v Wiggins (1980) 71 Cr App R 213 at 218; Morris v Beardmore [1981] AC 446 at 455. This was applied in Coco v The Queen (1994) 179 CLR 427 at 454; R v Entry Clearance Officer; Ex parte Amin [1983] 2 AC 818 at 836. This was applied in my dissent in IW v The City of Perth (1997) 191

Looking back, it may have been the very caution in Scarman's concept of what it was to be a judge that set his more liberal instincts searching for new and principled ways to contribute to creativity through law reform, through purposive interpretation and through judicial exposition of fundamental rights and freedoms. Certainly, these were the innovative directions that he took in the law. As a judge he was skilled in the synthesis of legal doctrine. But it was usually for analysis, exposition and restatement of the law that he was respected. For inventiveness we are obliged to look elsewhere.

THE PROMISE OF LAW REFORM

Scarman retired from active service as a judge in January 1986, shortly before his seventy-fifth birthday. By that time he had become the Senior Law Lord. On the English Bench there was nowhere else to go. Yet he remained strongly engaged with issues of law reform and increasingly with questions of human rights. He also discovered more time to indulge his love of opera, a passion that dated back to witnessing Madame Butterfly with the Allied Commanders in Rome in 1944, performed soon after that city's liberation\(^91\).

---

32.

Scarman's courtesy to everyone was legendary; but his resolve was unmistakeable. In retirement, he became involved, with Lord Devlin, in campaigns to reopen the convictions of a number of Irish prisoners: the Tottenham Three, the Guildford Four, the Birmingham Six and the Maguire Seven. He was criticised for assailing the majority conclusions in the Spycatcher case\(^92\) in a letter to The Times, published before the reasons were available. It was said that his action, in this respect, was "misguided"\(^93\), especially because the majority had taken pains to explain their conclusions by reference to human rights concerns that had ostensibly motivated his letter.

Scarman served a long term as Chancellor of Warwick University (1977-1989). His service to British society and the law was honoured by many Fellowships and Doctorates although it is said that Lord Diplock discouraged such recognition for him, perhaps through envy or possibly a narrow view of legal merit. Scarman had good taste and thoroughly disapproved of formal dinners, describing them as a "menace to men in public life. It's heavy, it's tedious and it's tiring". He made one exception for dinners at Middle Temple where he felt "among one's own". He nominated as his recreations gardening and walking in Hyde Park with his wife, Ruth. He died at Westgate on Sea in Kent on 8 December 2004. His wife and their son were left to witness the mixture of grief and acclaim in Britain and abroad that centred on this remarkable man.

\(^{91}\) Ibid. The story of this operatic epiphany also appears in John Mortimer's Character Parts.

\(^{93}\) Lee, 162.

Scarman's contribution to law reform extended far beyond his own country. The President of the Australian Law Reform Commission, Professor David Weisbrot recently described what happened in institutions built in Scarman's image:

"Institutional law reform commissions first made their appearance in the United Kingdom in 1965 and quickly spread throughout the Australian States and Territories; New Zealand and the Pacific Islands; Canada (federal and provincial); Hong Kong and South Asia (India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka and Bangladesh); the Caribbean (Jamaica, Trinidad and Tobago) and Eastern and Southern Africa (South Africa, Namibia, Malawi, Lesotho, Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania, Zaire and Zimbabwe)."

---

96 Footnotes omitted. The footnotes refer to Chapters 1, 17, 28 and 29 of Promise.
The force behind the imitation of the Law Commission in every region and most countries of the Commonwealth of Nations, was not simply a late Imperial mimickery of an interesting British invention. It was an appreciation, perceived at roughly the same time, of a serious defect in the inherited systems of law-making and governance and a respect for the way in which Scarman and his colleagues had gone about responding to that defect. His visits throughout the Commonwealth were tireless. They were inspirational for those working on the systematic reform and simplification of the law. He persuaded many that this was an idea whose time has come.

But what would we say today, forty years on? Has the promise of law reform, as initiated by Scarman, been fulfilled? Have the brave predictions of those early days been sustained? What does the ledger show now, in the light of the contemporary, more hard-nosed time of the twenty-first century? These were the questions recently faced by participants who assembled in Australia to mark the thirtieth anniversary of the Australian Law Reform Commission - established ten years after Scarman’s Commission was set up.

The reflections of the Australian reformers are found in a book *The Promise of Law Reform*97. It records that the process of establishing law reform bodies has continued and, indeed, has stretched beyond traditional common law societies into civil law jurisdictions, such as Quebec and to non-English speaking countries such as Indonesia, Rwanda and Thailand. Some Commissions (as in Ontario and Newfoundland) have been abolished. Yet the institutional response to improvement of the law remains very much alive and entrenched around the world. This is a large, enduring and quite possibly permanent result of Scarman's legacy. It owes much to the example and work of the Law Commissions in Britain. They still constitute a most significant legacy from Scarman's implementation of Gerald Gardiner's bold concept.

---

Obviously, many things have changed in the intervening years so that institutional law reform could not but change too. One change, for the good, may be seen in the attitudes of the judiciary, Parliament, the Executive and the legal profession. In the early years, there were many in the judiciary, especially, who were hostile to institutional law reform. In Australia, one distinguished State Chief Justice expressed the view that there was altogether too much change in the law. He and others of like mind looked with undisguised suspicion on "those who are paid to be reformers".

---

98 E Singini, Foreword in Promise, v.

A measure of the change in professional attitudes since those days may be seen in the growing judicial citation of law reform reports and papers. In 1995, in Canada, the total number of judicial citations of the law reform bodies of Canada was little more than ten. The Australian Law Reform Commission was cited in about thirty cases. Yet by 2004, the Canadian citations had jumped to 160; those of the ALRC were almost 600\(^\text{100}\). Using law reform reports and papers as an accurate summary of the current law, a source of criticism of its content and a discussion of its policies has now become commonplace in judicial as well as other legal writings. I do not have figures for United Kingdom citations; but I doubt that the proportions would be very different.

Similarly, lawmakers are now much more conscious of the utility of law reform bodies. Where complex and sensitive questions arise, it is not uncommon for judges and parliamentary committees to recommend the referral of particular issues to the Commission. Sometimes the Executive Government finds this an attractive solution, particularly where public consultation and thorough examination of complex legal subjects need to be undertaken in order to secure legislation that is right.

Most importantly, the legal profession now has high expectations of law reform bodies. Certainly in Australia, the old resistance has given way to a culture of acceptance and appreciation for institutional law reform work. In most parts of the Commonwealth, there are no lawyers of today's generation who have not grown up with busy and productive law reform bodies as part of the regular and familiar legal machinery of the state. In effect, such institutions have become an element of the constitutional arrangements for legal renewal. In most places, this renders them safe from abolition. In effect, they have become part of the furniture. This can have its own problems. Scarman realised, from the first, the importance of keeping the law reform agency as something distinct from the ordinary governmental legal bureaucracy. If this were not done and if independence were not preserved, most of the justification for institutional law reform commissions would be lost.

\(^{100}\) See Figure 14.6, "Judicial citation of Law Reform Work" in B Opeskin "Measuring Success" in Promise, 203 at 219.

There are many changes in law reform today when compared to Scarman's day. Thus, the belief in major "block buster" reports, with comprehensive draft statutes addressed to large topics of social concern, has declined in recent times. A more modest view is now generally adopted of the capacity of legislation to change society and to address its problems\(^\text{101}\). Alterations to the composition of the public sector, down-sizing and privatisation, together with the out-sourcing of former public services mean that legislation may not always now be the favoured vehicle for law reform. The introduction of change will today often require a more complex interaction of strategies and practices\(^\text{102}\).

\(^{101}\) Weisbrot, in Promise, 30. See also M D Kirby, "Are We There Yet?", Chapter 30 of Promise, 433 at 438.

\(^{102}\) Weisbrot, ibid, 35-36; Kirby, ibid, 439.
Sometimes the proper response to a law reform problem may be a recommendation that the law be left unchanged. Such recommendations tend to throw the implementation rate of law reform reports, measured by ensuing statutes, into disarray. This is a new insight, gained since Scarman's time.

Another new perspective arises in the reconsideration of the notion that law reform is best done by the one professional body that brings together the efforts previously assigned to a multitude of ad hoc committees. In Scarman's day, the bold ambition to examine the whole law suggested that such examination should be performed by the one coordinating body. With time, this ambition has surrendered to the demands of powerful Ministers who insist on forming their own committees and appointing their own reformers.

Both in the United Kingdom and in Australia major projects to rewrite income tax law have been launched, with support from the 103 The ALRC in its report on the civil justice system in Australia did not recommend major changes to the adversarial system. See Australian Law Reform Commission, Managing Justice: A Review of the Federal Civil Justice System (ALRC 89, 2000) noted Kirby, ibid, 438.

104 E Caldwell, "A Vision of Tidiness: Codes, Consolidation and Statute Law Revision", Chapter 3 in Promise, 40 at 45-48.

105 M Payne, "Law Reform and the Legislature", Chapter 21 in Promise, 302 at 313; cf Commissioner of Taxation v Stone (2005) 79 ALJR 956 at 968 [74]-[76]. Senator Payne is a Member of the Australian Senate and chair of the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.
Treasury, a body that never seems to be wanting in funds for its own pet projects of reform. Treasury is commonly peopled by officers unwilling to trust such an important topic to a small outside group of independent lawyers. In retrospect, the Olympian expectations attributed to law reform agencies established after Scarman's model, now seem naïve and unrealistic. How could any one group of mortals, with extremely modest resources and very many tasks, ever have a real chance of reforming the entirety of the law when the target itself was always expanding at an increasing pace\textsuperscript{106}?

Just as in today's world commentators, in and outside the law, examine judicial decisions and predict judicial outcomes by reference to any track record exposing deeply felt values, so with inquiries the truth has been learned (if ever it was doubted) that appointments influence outcomes. We now understand that many topics of law reform are far from value-free.

Even apparently technical subjects sometimes defy the ambition of a totally pure and neutral treatment\textsuperscript{107}. This is why Ministers and their officials commonly like to keep control of the programme of official law reform inquiries and of the people who will perform them. The myth of totally value-free law may still persist in some quarters in England. Elsewhere in the common law world greater realism has intruded. This has affected not only judicial appointments but also appointments to, and the programmes of, law reform agencies.

\textsuperscript{106} Kirby, above n 101 in \textit{Promise}, 449.

\textsuperscript{107} Weisbrot, above n 95 in \textit{Promise}, 29-30. See also R MacDonald, "Continuity, Discontinuity, Stasis and Innovation", Chapter 6 of \textit{Promise}, 87 at 88-89.

One participant in the Australian reflection was Sir Edward Caldwell, who worked with Scarman on family law matters and who returned to the Law Commission in 2002 as Senior Counsel. He describes the bold ambition that Scarman outlined for revitalising the entire body of the law. According to that ambition, customary law, as declared by the judges in more than 300,000 reported decisions, would be moved to a set of interlinking codes expressed in statutory form. This, it was expected, would reduce the bulk of the law. It would concentrate its sources and expression. Sir Edward Caldwell observes:

"It is perhaps slightly surprising that Lord Scarman, with considerable experience both in the preparation and interpretation of legislation and writing nine years after the establishment of the Law Commission, should still have such 108 See eg J Hannaford, "Implementation" Chapter 15 in Promise, 222; L Glandfield, "Law Reform Through the Executive", Chapter 20 in Promise, 288. Mr Hannaford was Attorney-General for New South Wales. Mr Glandfield is Director-General of the New South Wales Attorney-General's Department.

---

109 Caldwell, above n 104 in Promise, 48.

110 Caldwell, above n 104 in Promise, 40 at 41.
Utopian views of the promise of law reform and of the contribution to fulfilling that promise to be made by law reform agencies”.

Yet Scarman's optimism was widely shared at the time. The aspirations were thoroughly immodest. The remit kept pace with the ambitions. But the resources and the capacity to deliver could never do so. In fact, legislation and case law has expanded exponentially, now supplemented by immediate access to the Internet and to many new jurisdictions. The statute book has blown out from approximately 7,500 pages of primary and subordinate legislation in the United Kingdom in 1965 to a total in 2003, including European Union legislation, of approximately 26,400 pages\(^\text{111}\). That figure excludes the 594 page Income Tax (Earnings and Pensions) Act 2003 (UK) which was a product of the British Tax Law Rewrite Project\(^\text{112}\). Faced with contemporary realities, some of Scarman's reforming optimism must now be seen as seriously over-confident, even possibly unreal.

Despite that, there remain projects that law reform agencies are still best at delivering. These include boring but essential tasks of statutory consolidation and revision; large tasks touching the interests of many governmental and private bodies; and projects necessitating consultation of the kind that the more traditional committees of the legislature and the Executive Government are ill-suited to perform.

\(^{111}\) Caldwell, ibid, 42.

\(^{112}\) Caldwell, ibid, 42, fn 7.
Amongst projects of the last-mentioned variety are those concerning the impact on the law of biotechnology. This was one of the early tasks assigned to the Australian Law Reform Commission\(^{113}\). The topic remains an important aspect of that Commission's current programme\(^{114}\). It is the kind of work that inter-disciplinary commissions led by lawyers can perform well\(^{115}\). When the new Chief Justice of the United States, Roberts CJ, assumed office he was told, accurately, that these were likely to be the main future challenges to the law. The experience of the High Court of Australia tends to confirm that prediction\(^{116}\).

The foregoing changes and adaptations to institutional law reform leave one crucial defect in Scarman's machinery. It is as serious today

---

\(^{113}\) Human Tissue Transplants (ALRC 7, 1977). See Kirby, in Promise, 439.

\(^{115}\) Dr Francis Collins, head of the Human Genome Project, described the work of the ARLC on the law and genome as "a truly phenomenal job that put Australia ahead of the rest of the world". Quoted in D Chalmers, "Science, Medicine and Health and the Work of the Australian Law Reform Commission", Chapter 26 in Promise at 374 at 381.

as it was in his time. Indeed, it is clearer now because the years have given emphasis to it. I refer to the failure, anywhere, to establish a satisfactory link between the institutional law reform body and the lawmakers with the power to convert proposals for legal reform into action.

Today, as in 1965, this remains the unresolved constitutional deficit of institutional law reform. A planned Regulatory Reform Bill in Britain will allow a Minister, by order, to implement recommendations of either Law Commission, with or without amendment (including recommendations that amend Acts of Parliament). If enacted, this will be an important step forward notwithstanding the Bill's qualifications and preconditions. Yet for large measures of proposed reform the basic problem will remain.

Perhaps that problem is unresolvable, given the advance in the intervening forty years, in the imperium of Executive Government (indeed of Prime Ministerial power) and the jealousy with which the reins of control over legislation are maintained by the chief political actors, advised by key officials. In some jurisdictions, governments have given undertakings to announce their responses to law reform reports within a specified time. The New Zealand Law Minister undertook to do

\[117\] See eg the chapters in Promise, written by J Hannaford, M Payne and L Glandfield above n 108 as well as R Sackville, "Law Reform Agencies and Royal Commissions: Toiling the Same Field?", Chapter 19 in Promise, 274.
so within six months of the tabling in Parliament of reports of the Law Commission of New Zealand. There is a similar arrangement in the United Kingdom but it works imperfectly. Earlier Australian Ministers flirted with like notions, interposing the prior examination of ALRC reports by a Parliamentary Committee. However, most such promises melt before the sun of the political agenda of the Executive government. Thus law reform reports are sometimes rejected for what is called "insufficiently demonstrated public benefit." All too frequently this is code language for a perceived lack of political benefit to the government. Parliament time is precious. Seemingly, it must be conserved to measures seen to help those in power to stay that way.

Often, as was observed in the Australian context, the chief impediment to the implementation of law reform reports is a log-jam created by a governmental decision-making process that has not kept pace with the needs of contemporary governance. Even for obvious necessities of reform, reports can lie fallow not for reasons of political opposition but because of indifference and institutional failures. The intensity of this problem varies as between countries. To overcome it, improvisations, personal intercessions, gentle nudgings and lobbying techniques are universally adopted by law reform bodies. Yet the institutions of lawmaking remain basically unchanged. If anything, the outcomes are more problematic as law reform loses some of its novelty and depends on personnel who struggle for the impact of a Scarman.

118 See J B Robertson, "Initiation and Selection of Projects", Chapter 7 in Promise, 102 at 111-114.

All democrats want Parliament to succeed as the palladium of the people and the chief organ of lawmaking. However, the lesson of the forty years since Scarman created the Law Commission is that Parliament has not reformed itself to rise systematically to this function. Where Scarman failed to solve the serious institutional flaw in his new design, it should not be surprising that his successors have enjoyed no greater success, anywhere120.

HUMAN RIGHTS

But what of the second pillar of Scarman’s achievements in reshaping the law to an acceptance of notions of fundamental human rights? He was not alone in this achievement. But it did require a very important shift in the thinking that was traditional to lawyers raised with the ideas of the common law. To be accepted, judicially enforced human rights needed safe, reliable and respected supporters. This is what Scarman gave the human rights movement in Britain - a land and a culture traditionally most suspicious of such notions\textsuperscript{121}.

120 Kirby, above n 101 in Promise at 445.

For such lawyers, rights normally comprise only the residuum left by the absence of lawful restrictions, whether expressed in legislation, subordinate legislation or judge-made law\textsuperscript{122}. This was a central and long-standing difference between the highly pragmatic, problem-solving character of the common law (based in English ideas and historical instances limiting the intrusions of government) and the more conceptual European notions of declaratory grants of rights by authority (based in natural law doctrine, reinforced by the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church predominant in much of Europe but not in Britain).

It was probably the terrible events of the Second World War that Scarman and so many others had seen at first hand, together with the discoveries, after that conflict, of the full extent of the oppression and acts of genocide, that led the British government to ratify the \textit{European Convention on Human Rights}\textsuperscript{123}. Once that Rubicon was crossed and \textsuperscript{121} A Lester and D Pannick, \textit{Human Rights Law and Practice} (2nd ed, 2004), p 4 [1.09].

\textsuperscript{123} The United Kingdom was the first State to ratify the Convention: see A Lester and D Pannick, \textit{Human Rights Law and Practice} (2nd ed, 2004) p 6 [1.16].
the countries of the new Commonwealth, in their independence constitutions, began to follow the basic rights doctrines of the United States Constitution, it was probably inevitable that Britain itself would eventually follow suit.

Changes in the character and composition of British society and the stimulus of decisions of the European Court of Human Rights hastened the demands for incorporation of the European Convention into British domestic law. However, it was Scarman’s Hamlyn Lectures of 1974: English Law - The New Dimension\(^{124}\) that contained the most powerful and influential call, made at a critical time, for this course to be taken. He proposed the establishment of a Supreme Court of the United Kingdom with the power to give the fundamental rights effect in the context of a body of public law that Scarman saw as by now inadequate to the needs of modern governance. His was an heroic vision. It captured the imagination of young lawyers. Like many such ideas, it took decades to be accepted and to prosper. But prosper it did.

Scarman’s lectures of 1974 constituted a truly original appeal for fresh thinking about the content of the English legal system. They were rendered more influential because of the great legal offices that Scarman had already attained by 1974 and by his authentic credentials as a judge who was quite cautious about the judicial capacity to fix \(^{124}\) Stevens and Sons, London, 1974 (New Dimension).

In this, and his warnings against a "naked [judicial] usurpation of the legislative function under the thin disguise of interpretation"\textsuperscript{126}, Scarman presented quite a contrast to Lord Denning's alternative view that judges had made the common law in the past and could unmake and remould it for the present and the future.

Scarman placed his Hamlyn Lectures squarely in the regional context of British adherence to the European Communities in 1972 and the broader global moves for the protection of human rights that he saw as being in the lineage of the English \textit{Magna Carta}\textsuperscript{127}. Oliver Cromwell had promised a new \textit{Magna Carta}. That promise was lost with the end of the Commonwealth. It was only partly recaptured in the \textit{Bill of Rights} of 1688\textsuperscript{128}. Now, by many examples and illustrations, Scarman portrayed the need to arm the contemporary judges with new tools to solve the multitude of individual and social problems that presented to the law. What the judges could not do, in his view, with the conventional tools and within legitimate judicial choices, they might be able to perform with new statutory powers drawing on ideas derived from the European

\textsuperscript{125} \textit{Ibid}, 1.

\textsuperscript{127} \textit{New Dimension}, 14.

\textsuperscript{128} \textit{Ibid}, 17-18.
Convention and the wider global movement for human rights. He reminded the audience of his Hamlyn Lectures:\textsuperscript{129}

"... [T]he human rights movement, which is now not merely a campaign but a matter of international obligation, reveals the basic imbalance of our Constitution, and points towards the need for a new constitutional settlement. Without a Bill of Rights protected from repeal, amendment, or suspension by the ordinary processes of a bare Parliamentary majority, controlled by the government of the day, human rights will be at risk".

In its time, this was an extraordinary statement. Most of all it was remarkable coming from a leader of a legal system that had looked on rights in quite a different way and which trusted Parliament, not courts, to correct injustices. Scarman had his insight about human rights earlier than most others. He saw that the lessons of recent history, the changing composition of society and the systemic failings of Parliament and the other organs of government made it imperative to introduce new mechanisms of governance. For him, particularly when times are abnormally alive with fear and prejudice the common law and majoritarian parliamentary rule represented an inadequate conception of democracy:\textsuperscript{130} At least so much had become clear for Britain as it evolved three parts through the twentieth century.

\textsuperscript{129} \textit{Ibid}, 69.

\textsuperscript{130} Ibid, 15. I am indebted to Elizabeth Evatt for this insight.
What brought Scarman, with his generally conventional education, background and training, to such unorthodox and challenging conclusions? Was it his experiences in the War? Was it his frustration in the planning cases he argued as counsel, because of the notorious gaps in administrative law? Was it his years in the Law Commission, hearing submissions from countless community groups of ordinary citizens, telling of the injustices and inefficiencies they had experienced in the law as it operated in practice? Was it his release from the strictures that oppressed him in the courtroom that set him upon a perception of the new society around him, with its many minorities and its growing diversity? Was it his reflection on the serious flaw in the parliamentary solutions to law reform that lay at the heart of the first of the pillars that he had propounded – reform through legislation advised by the Law Commission?

It was probably all of these things. But what is astonishing, and most admirable, is that Scarman came instinctively to a perception that some lawyers still resist but which is reinforced by any serious reflection upon the way we are now governed. It is the way we are governed that called forth the need for a new dimension of law. Scarman's contribution was that he saw this clearly and expressed it; and was one of the first to do so.

The formalities of our constitutional arrangements, in Britain as much as Australia, no longer accord with the theories that most of us grew up with and were taught at university. The notions, even the basic institutions, of government are no longer what they were. In a country with a written constitution, such as Australia, the document may not even contain a mention of the primary actors – the Prime Minister, the Cabinet, the political advisers, the political parties, the modern media\textsuperscript{131}. In Britain, without a comprehensive written constitution, the defects of constitutional design have become, if anything, even clearer. Hence Scarman's search for something better. It was a search that took him to the model adopted two centuries earlier in the United States and more recently in Europe. This involved a written text enshrining a fundamental charter of human rights but operating in a world where human rights, by now, had become part of international law.

Three decades after Scarman's call, we can see more clearly the changes that have come over our institutions of governance. The changes oblige us to rethink "the relationship between common law and statute, and that between the judicial and political process"\textsuperscript{132}. The future directions were not so clear in 1974; but this only makes Scarman's foresight the more remarkable. The changes to which I refer are as true of the United Kingdom as of Australia\textsuperscript{133}.

\textsuperscript{131} None of these institutions or persons is mentioned in the Australian Constitution.

\textsuperscript{133} cf Lord Hailsham, "Elected Dictatorship", 30 Parliamentary Affairs 324 (1997) and Paul Kelly, Rethinking Australian Governance - The Howard Legacy, Cunningham Lecture for the Academy of Social Sciences in Australia, 6 November 2005.
The role of the Crown has diminished. In Australia, even the old courtesies are now often neglected. The head of government has taken over many functions formerly performed by the head of state or her representatives. Even the traditional entitlements "to be consulted, to encourage and to warn"\(^{134}\) are not always observed now\(^{135}\). Reality often defies appearances and ancient constitutional traditions. The role of the head of government has enlarged immeasurably. The process escalates whichever political party wins the Treasury Benches.

In part, this seemingly irreversible change has come about because modern electronic media focuses attention on the chief political office-holder. Journalists are endlessly fascinated with the political games that are played. Even the role of cabinet is sometimes diminished by functions now played by key ministers, counselled by their political and media advisers. Political staffers are a new phenomenon of great power.

Key officials who once worked in the ministries have been shifted into the political offices of the Prime Minister and the Ministers. The \(^{134}\) cf E McWhinney, The Governor-General and The Prime Ministers (2005), Ronsdale, 166.

\(^{135}\) As for example the proposed abolition of the office of the Lord Chancellor which had endured for eight hundred years. See Lord Windlesham, "The Constitution Reform Act 2005: Judges and Constitutional Change" [2005] Public Law 806 at 815-816.
senior public servants have, in many cases, lost their permanence. Their influence, and their capacity and inclination to resist Ministers are diminished in proportion to their declining power and influence\textsuperscript{136}. The political party in government, has powers that are not reflected, or even mentioned, in the formal constitutional arrangements. Parliament's powers to control the Executive are diminished by the Executive's powers to offer promotion and patronage to Members of Parliament. The resignation of Ministers for wrong-doing within their Departments now seems to be virtually a dead letter. The most that happens, and that quite rarely, is that a public servant is dismissed or disciplined. Ministerial responsibility, in the Westminster sense, has been eroded almost to vanishing point.

In Australia, even the traditional\textsuperscript{137} and constitutional role of the Parliament, as a body with specific functions to permit or refuse appropriations for the ordinary annual services of government, has been lessened by the adoption of new ways, copied from Britain, of expressing appropriations. These are ways less susceptible to detailed parliamentary scrutiny and control\textsuperscript{138}. Occasionally back-benchers snatch a part in the political dramas – but this is exceptional and it usually depends on chance events. It tends to become a story in itself, whatever the issue that is involved. Freedom of information legislation contains more and more exceptions protective of governmental secrecy.\footnote{P Birkinshaw, "Government and information - the limits of law's empire" (2005) 6 Amicus Curiae 3 at 10-11.}

---

\textsuperscript{137} \textit{Brown v West} (1990) 169 CLR 195.

The sources of lobby interests have been enlarged. The lobbyist is now a professional operator, paid to gain the attention of those with power or influence. The media has also changed. All too often it lives on emailed releases. It both mirrors and creates political moods. Commonly, it avoids searching analysis and promotes a culture of personality and infotainment.\footnote{In consequence there is growing reported mistrust of electronic news and declining sales of the print media: see D T Z Mindich, Tuned Out: Why Americans Under 40 Don’t Follow the News, OUP, 2004.} There are notable exceptions; but the contemporary mix of fact and comment and the features of some tabloid media as players in the political game has changed many of the old traditions. Here is another extra constitutional source of power that has expanded greatly and globally in recent times.

In this landscape the judiciary is a last independent resource for the protection of basic rights. And even the judiciary is now targeted by politicians and media for their own ends in ways that would not so long ago have been regarded as a scandal. We have recently seen the high politicisation of judicial appointments in the United States. But in 1996 the Acting Prime Minister of Australia stated that future appointments to the High Court of Australia would be of "capital C Conservative[s]"\textsuperscript{141}. If rights are not expressed in the Constitution, or defined by Parliament, the judiciary may be powerless to defend minorities, especially vulnerable and unpopular individuals and groups\textsuperscript{142}.

As we enter the twenty-first century, the very notion of the "sovereignty" of Parliament has become a somewhat inapposite concept, certainly in a country like Australia that divides the sovereignty of the people amongst a number of institutions, federal and State, that formally make the law\textsuperscript{143}. In Britain, talk of the sovereignty of Parliament is still quite popular\textsuperscript{144}. But there is a marked disparity between the theory of representative and responsible government and the reality of \textsuperscript{141} See N Savva, "Fischer seeks a more conservative court" \textit{The Age} (Melbourne) 5 March 1997, 1.

\textsuperscript{143} Reflection on this position has led Lord Justice Sedley to propound a bipolar sovereignty in Parliament and the courts, with the Executive government answerable to each: S Sedley, "Everything and Nothing – the changing Constitution" \textit{London Review of Books}, 7 October 2004, 10 at 12.

elections held at three, four or five year intervals when a single vote is portrayed as authorising everything that follows in the elected government's lawmaking. A former Chief Justice of Australia, Sir Anthony Mason, recently observed that the notion that Parliament is responsive to the will of the people, except in the most remote, indirect and contingent way, must now be regarded as "quaint or romantic". The need is for a modern "form of democratic government that will prove workable over time".

It is into this world of modern government that Scarman's idea of an enforceable statement of fundamental rights is projected. In Britain the Human Rights Act 1998 (UK) was enacted, fulfilling Scarman's dream. In Australia, we have desultory talk of a Bill of Rights. However, save for the Australian Capital Territory, and then in modest form, there is no present actuality. Australian politicians of both major political groupings are generally either luke-warm to the notion of legally protected fundamental human rights or strongly opposed. Opponents talk repeatedly of the perils of "judicial activism" and the threat to 145 Mason, above n 136, 69.

---

148 The government of the State of Victoria has announced the intention to propose the enactment of a "Statutory charter of rights and responsibilities": Australian Financial Review, 21 December 2005, 8.
democracy. To this talk it is necessary to reply, as Lord Bingham has done:

"Constitutional dangers exist no less in too little judicial activism as in too much. There are limits to the legitimacy of executive or legislative decision-making, just as there are to decision-making by the courts".

The statement made by Lord Bingham appeared in an important decision of the House of Lords upholding the rights of persons of foreign nationality, detained without trial and unconvicted but accused under counter-terrorism legislation. It would not have been possible for the decision of the House of Lords in that case, or many others, to have been reached, or the statement to have been made, without the Human Rights Act. The enactment of that law came just in time. It was the response of the United Kingdom Parliament, in part to the new British relationship with Europe but in part as Lord Chancellor Irvine acknowledged at the time, to the urgings of great British jurists such as Scarman. It is at least open to question whether the Executive Government would have proposed this second pillar after 11 September 2001. Yet now it is there. It is protective and its influence is likely to expand with each passing year.

Suggestions for the adoption of a national constitutional or at least statutory Bill of Rights in Australia to temper the "decline of the previous high standards of liberal constitutionalism"\(^{151}\) are brushed aside. In this respect Australians are, as Scarman observed when he visited Australia in 1980, "more English than the English" – but we are now like the English as they were before the Human Rights Act, not as today. Effectively, Australia is now the only modern Western country that must face the challenges of the present age, and the changes in the institutions of government without a constitutional, or even statutory, charter of rights to temper political autarchy with occasional judicial reminders of fundamental freedoms that must be respected.

When I was young, like Lord Denning and most common lawyers\(^{152}\), I opposed the adoption of a bill of rights. I defended parliamentary law-making and electoral accountability. But the changes that have come over our institutions in the past thirty years – under successive governments of every political complexion – make the mantra of democratic law-making increasingly unconvincing. Scarman's insight now demands that Australians must ask whether we are the only nation in step? Do our elected parliaments operate so effectively that we have no need for judicial protection of the basic rights of the people – putting such rights beyond political assault or erosion?

\(^{151}\) Mason, above n 136, p 68.

\(^{152}\) J Mortimer, Character Parts (above n 16), 203.
A MASTER SPIRIT OF THE LAW

Human rights provisions are not a panacea for every defect of the law or of our system of government. Scarman never suggested that they were. Nor, when they exist, do such charters give judges a free hand to do what they like. Typically, they are expressed in words that bind. Around those words has accumulated a large body of jurisprudence to guide the judges whenever a provision is relevant. They afford no antidote to the defects and omissions in technical aspects of the law that have no bearing on stated rights. They do not provide an answer to every problem of law reform\textsuperscript{153}.

This said, in the context of the very significant changes that have occurred in the way we are governed, statements of binding human rights moderate the risks and defects of the institutions of law-making as they have now evolved. Sir William Wade, as usual, put it well\textsuperscript{154}:

"Subject as it is to the vast empires of executive power that have been created, the public must be able to rely on the law to ensure that all this power may be used in a way conformable to its ideas of fair dealing and good administration. As liberty is subtracted, justice must be added\textsuperscript{155}.

It is not given to many judges, to leave a lasting, and probably permanent, mark on a nation's basic legal institutions. To contribute two such marks requires an extraordinary human spirit. It suggests a person with special gifts of intellect, emotion, persuasiveness and human empathy. These are the qualities that Lord Scarman deployed throughout his life. They have affected the development of law in the United Kingdom. They continue to influence, if only by example, the development of law in other countries of the common law, including Australia.

It is too early, in 2006, to attempt a full assessment of Scarman's role in charting the new dimension of the law in our tradition. Yet we can say with certainty that his influence endures because he tackled fundamental things. Law reform and basic human rights are on a stronger foundation in Britain because of his foresight and action. The law reform idea has spread far and wide. If it still remains flawed in its delivery, the second idea, that of human rights, was Scarman's answer to the need for a judiciary with replenished powers, able to attend to injustices that Parliament had created thoughtlessly or overlooked.

Both of these ideas grew out of Scarman’s deep conviction that law and its institutions have to adapt to the real world of modern government but in ways founded ultimately in democratic legitimacy. There was a fundamental unity in his thinking about law. To the end, his caution as a judge arose from his deep English conviction that new mechanisms were needed, but that they had to be authorised by Parliament in the name of the people. Those mechanisms duly came. The Law Commission. The Human Rights Act. He breathed life into the first. He foresaw the necessity of the second. For each he was an early herald and then a powerful advocate.

For the work of such a master spirit of the law we must be grateful. He made a difference. He had flaws, as all of us do. But his achievements still encourage and inspire us. And his greatest achievement was to see the growing defects in the constitutional arrangements of Westminster democracy and to propose ways by which we could repair and redress them.
THE LAW COMMISSION OF ENGLAND AND WALES

GRAY’S INN, LONDON

MONDAY, 20 FEBRUARY 2006

LAW REFORM & HUMAN RIGHTS - SCARMAN'S GREAT LEGACY

The Hon Justice Michael Kirby AC CMG